The USS Constellation: The Ship and the Medal.

The USS Constellation was the first commissioned warship in the U.S. Navy, one of six built under the Naval Act of 1794 to combat Barbary pirates. Built as a 36-gun frigate, she was broken up in 1853 and a new USS Constellation was built in the same port and launched in 1854. Whether she was broken up or simply rebuilt became a controversy that was not resolved until 1999 when construction dates were found in the surviving USS Constellation.

The original frigate was built to an unusual design created by Joshua Humphreys, a Quaker. She had a long keel and narrow beam allowing superior speed and the ability to out run the faster ships of the line. In addition, she was built with heavy oak planking that allowed her to overpower her opponents at sea.

By the end of the 1800s, many believed there was only one USS Constellation that had simply been revised and rebuilt in 1854. Later research proved that to not be the case. One needs only to have looked to numismatics and historic medals to discover that a medal was struck from the original ship's copper to commemorate its destruction. Dan shared his example of the medal at the end of his talk.

The evening raffle winners included:
